
Prominent experts and researchers from across the U.S. contributed 10 chapters on various issues related to school desegregation.

Lindseth has a national reputation in representing both states and school districts in complex school desegregation cases, both at the trial level and in the appellate courts. He has represented the States of Florida, New York, Minnesota, California, Connecticut, Michigan and Missouri and many large urban school districts (e.g., in the Atlanta, St. Louis, Knoxville, Seattle, Savannah, Charleston and Washington, D.C. metropolitan areas) in major cases, most of which involved lengthy and controversial trials.

Recently, Lindseth successfully represented DeKalb County School District (DCSD) in their lawsuit against the state of Georgia. DCSD was awarded more than $110 million - moneys the state of Georgia previously failed to pay in order to properly fund DCSD's busing program required by federal desegregation law.
